

THE SOUTH AFRICAN 37

Thanks to private landowners, enlightened game departments, and responsible professional hunters, the indigenous wildlife of South Africa has proliferated in recent decades; and not just the more common species, but also the species that have made remarkable comebacks from near extinction including black wildebeest, bontebok, and white rhino. To encourage the hunting of all of the challenging indigenous game animals of South Africa, the Professional Hunters' Association of South Africa ("PHASA") now gives an award to those hunters who successfully pursue The South African 37. This video not only shows all 37 qualifying species, including 30 on-camera hunts, but it also shows much of the travel and scenery that has caused South Africa to be called "a world in one country."
